Better than the Dictionary. Three wise young women from one of the nearby suburban schools who were in town for the Easter holidays maintained in a learned discussion that the words "spinster" and "old maid" are no longer identical in meaning. They asserted that the term "old maid" means a single woman of advanced age who has never had an opportunity to marry, while a "spinster" now means a single woman of advanced age who has had matrimontal offers, but, for some unaccountable reason, refused them. If it is true that declare, have come to possess this important distinction in meaning, our dictionaries are behind the times and need revising. Webster and Worcester give interchangeable definitions for both words. But Worcester incidentally gives this interesting bit of history of the word "Spinyoung woman should never be married till she had spun herself a set of body, table and bed linen. From this custom all unmarried women were termed spinsters, and this appeliation they still retain in all deeds and law proceedings." Perhaps on these two particular words the school girl of the hour is better authority than the dictionary.
